

Drones & Dresses . by James Whittingham

Product description:

Outrage and shame propel a young woman into self-exile from her homeland to fight alongside the resistance movement of a neighbouring country, colonised and humiliated by her people for too long. She marries a local - a marriage of convenience - and together they hatch a plot, and a war machine, which they hope will overthrow the colonial oppressors once and for all.

Hard labour, intellectual and physical, followed by epic failure and all the ingrained prejudice spews forth. Why is she here amongst these ridiculous peasants? Did they ever want to be freed? Or is everyone happy just performing the role handed to them at birth? But lost high in nearby hills, she sees all too clearly the foibles of her ways - rotting former-villagescapes a foretaste of what comes to all human endeavour. Ignoring this bleak warning from history she instead hatches an even more grand and fabulous plan; that of cultivating a whole new nation from scratch, one in which all the old certainties would turn to dust. She returns home to face all charges and her true identity becomes apparent.

She watched him walk into the bakery and looked around at the village. 'Why do cultures look to the weather for their identity?' she wondered to herself, 'Why are they so proud of it when it's beyond their control? Culture is something we make. The weather makes itself.' E emerged from the bakery and waved a paper bag with something inside it then entered shop two. She looked around at the village again. 'Maybe they see themselves in it. I'm proud of my drones...'
